This website shows an interesting scrolling interaction for users in the sense that as you scroll down like you would on any other page, this experience takes it literally by tying it to the idea of deep sea exploration. It also serves a dual purpose in educating users what kind of species live under certain depths and regions. Near the end/bottom, it has a shocking element to it in the sense that it shows that there is trash that exists down there, signifying that we all need to uphold ourselves to a better standard in not polluting our environment.

The idea of digital communities and reading opinion and stories online is one of the things that really drives the internet. This website shows a ThreeJS communal forest where you can plant a tree and then help others grow with a small note of encouragement. The interactive element of allowing the user to explore this website at their own pace is what really makes this experience unique.
